kinase gene STYK1. In eukaryotic messenger RNA, introns are required to expose the coding domain of the polypeptide for recognition by the ribosome. In the majority of eukaryotic genes, introns can be spliced by using small nuclear RNAs and the spliceosome, composed of a large number of ribonucleoprotein complexes. However, few introns have been shown to be regulated, and how this regulation is coordinated with RNA processing of the host gene is poorly understood. Here we describe the characterization of the Arabidopsis thaliana gene STYK1, encoding a serine/threonine kinase, and show that its transcription is regulated by a novel, relatively long intron. The STYK1 gene has 13 exons and a 5' UTR of 1.4 kb, and a 3' UTR of 0.77a5ca646e
